EDITORIAL.

It is only an echo of college life, a wandering ray from a student's bower that comes to greet you.

Behind the curtain of college life, much there is that will bear recital—much that need not be told. But, within these pages the veil is uplifted, and you behold the painted gleam of a student's life.

Through the KALEIDOSCOPE, you behold the true landscape, ever changing and varying in form and color.

'Tis through this medium that perchance the "old graduate" may view an object which may tend to revive again the scenes of other days. Again, he may chance to spy another "painting on the wall," which is unknown to him, and which shares no part in the memory of his college days.

Perhaps the parent may cast his eye listlessly over the field of view, to find his boy bound by ties and associations which are meaningless to himself, but which characterize a student's life. But, whoever views this scenery, ever varying and changing in intensity and degree of color, whether he regards it as beautiful, pleasing and complete in itself, or the opposite, yet, please remember, that in the background of our KALEIDOSCOPE are only a few gleamings imperfectly sketched by a student's brush.

We hope that, the style and appearance of the KALEIDOSCOPE will meet with the sanction of you all. It has just been ushered into existence. It trusts for support, not so much upon its own merits, as upon the indulgence and favor you may deign to give it.

And may each class, as year after year it inherits the task which rest upon us, endeavor to beautify and perfect the ever changing scenery of our KALEIDOSCOPE. Then will our efforts have been of avail and for its succes you will ever have the best wishes of '74.

EACH year Middlebury College summons to her Halls, men of every variety of character and attainment. From farm and workshop, from country and city, from the North and South—they come in answer to her call. Widely different as they may be in the beginning of their course, College Life will have its amalgamating effect upon them. Constant association, and continual interchange of thought and feeling, during four years of labor and of pleasure, must give to a class, whatever be its elements, a positive individual character.

But fortune favored the Class of '74 at the outset. The members of our class were lively stones at the very beginning, little needing the attrition of College Life, or the chisel and mallet of College Professors, to fit us to each other.

We came with definite purposes in view. We came with the purpose of being men, whether Freshmen, Sophomores, Juniors or Seniors; with the purpose of being true to ourselves and to the College, whose interests are common with our own; with the purpose of thinking and acting for ourselves, regardless of the so-called customs and usages of College Life. We came with the purpose of so living and acting as to leave behind us a record to which we could ever turn with pleasure and with pride; with the purpose of fitting ourselves for the great world of thought and action, into which we are soon to enter.

These were our purposes, but to put them into execution has not always been an easy task. Many are the battles we have fought, many are the victories we have won; battles in which truth and manhood were at stake, victories in which truth and manhood were the conquerors. But soon we are to leave the battlefield of College for the battlefield of Life. For the last time, dear reader, we send to you our names as a Class; soon we shall go out to you ourselves. Soon we must depend—not upon each other, for we shall be separated—but upon you, O stern, relentless World, to whose protection we must fly, when Alma Mater releases us from her long and loved embrace!

HAIL, Junior year! Seventy classes have worshiped at thy shrine, since first our Alma Mater threw open her doors and admitted students to her classic halls. Almost three quarters of a century have elapsed, and three score years and ten find thee as young and as lovely as ever. We now, as votaries, bring offerings to thy temple. Through a long and weary journey we have come. Many difficulties we have met and surmounted. Many victories we have celebrated on the way. We have met the faculty in several sharp encounters. Demerits, suspension, and threatened expulsion have confronted us, but we still live; and none have fallen by reason of our afflictions. We are sorry, indeed, that we cannot bring our full original number with us in our devotions. Although our numbers are fewer by reason of circumstances beyond our control, still we are united, brave and strong, and deserving of thy blessings. For two years we have been preparing to enjoy thy pleasures, and now we gladly exchange the hard labor of delving among the Greek roots for gentler toils in the fields of science. The laborer is worthy of his reward and the weary should have rest. Yes, Junior year, we hail thee, we bless thee and we will honor thee.

'76.

AGAIN we have assembled within the walls of our venerable institution. Not now as one year ago, do we come out of the class room with nervous and unsteady footsteps. No longer are we compelled to look up, and reverence those whom we suppose to be our superiors. We, ourselves, have at last attained the Sophomoric mantle, and are priviledged to demand the same respect to our superior station, and undisputed lore. We have meekly trod the thorny path of Freshman year, and in our journey have formed the acquaintance of some distinguished individuals. The experience we had with some of these illustrious personages was such, as we shall not soon forget. The first to call our attention, to stagger and confuse our minds, was that venerable saint, Old Bourdon. We also wandered into the silent mist of the past, and offered our sacrifices at the shrines of Livy, Herodotus and Cicero. We have stood on Olympus with old Homer, and drank with Horace from the sparkling fountains of Bandusia. And now, old '76 stands upon the threshold of Sophomore year. Great as is the responsibility which rests upon us, and numerous as are our cares, we promptly assume the dignity of Sophs, and fearleesly enter upon our duties. No longer do we allow the mask and the horn to hang idly on the wall; but trusting our inspiring motto, "Blow ye the trumpet, blow," we don our dusky regimentals, and, in the solemn stillness of night, send a thrill of terror through the quaking hearts of innocent little Freshies,—the tender objects of our care. As they hear our melodious strains wafted upon the midnight air, can they longer doubt that they are welcomed within our halls?

As the year opens upon us, we look around to enumerate the seats left vacant by those, who, one year ago, expected to share the toils and rewards of '76. With sorrow we note their absence, and their familiar faces we sadly miss. Yet, wherever they are, they carry with them our best wishes and heartfelt desire for their welfare and happiness.

'76, journey onward, and may our success in the past be as the faint, rosy dawn, which ushers in the bright and glorious day, with brightness ever increasing, until, in the golden light, the end is far more glorious than the beginning.

AGAIN old Middlebury has echoed her happy greeting, and we stand as objects of her choice. College life has at last dawned upon us, and it is with pride that we join the Freshman band. Joyfully do we commence our journey onward towards the goal of our ambition—a sheepskin. Although on the verge of College life, yet there are many pleasant things to remember in connection with these few months of our Freshman year.

We have been signally victorious in all our struggles for liberty, canes and horns. Yet, we hope we have caused no sadness in the hearts of the noble (?!) Sophs. We certainly feel no pride in our position above them, and one Sabbath we even allowed them to neglect their usual duty as our advance guard, and graciously permitted them to follow us from church.

On the whole, the class ahead of us have faithfully performed their duty as reception committee, and in these few, short weeks, we have learned much of college life.

We have well begun, and so may we continue throughout our college course; may '76 and '77 be ever bound by ties of friendship, and may our Alma Mater never more be troubled by the quarrels of her children.

We hope, as a class, to be united. Then shall we be valuable to our friends, and dangerous to our foes. Let us be faithful, and so improve our privileges here, that, when we leave this institution, we may justly receive the plaudit, "Well done."
